There is every indication that we will have a bigger and better Winter Artisan Show than last year which was very successful for a first year show."

My thoughts on the NATIONAL HISTORIC PRESERVATION CONFERENCE 2012...

I was one of 21 LUCKY Oregon recipients, to receive a grant, to attend the 2012

National Historic Preservation Conference in Spokane WA, earlier this fall. This grant was funded by the Oregon Cultural Trust and this narrative describing my experiences at the conference was part of the grant requirements.

I grew up in Lewiston ID, so Spokane was the nearest “big city.” I have fond childhood memories of the area, so this made my visit even more special. It was like going home and seeing this city with new eyes.

This national conference spanned four days or better, and attendees came from all over the country. Unfortunately Hurricane Sandy had just hit the east coast, so there were both session presenters and attendees who were unable to make the journey.

Here are four highlights for me, of many, during this conference.

Several of the venues for conference gatherings, were held in the downtown historic buildings. The Davenport Hotel, in the day, was internationally known for its luxury and service. When I was a kid in northern Idaho it was known as a run-down place, and not where one would go to stay. A few years back a local couple put millions of dollars into bringing the hotel back – and it worked. How LUCKY Spokane is to have this important restored treasure in their community.

Earlier in the week I watched a television documentary about the Davenport Hotel restoration. I learned about the “Circus Room.” I asked at the Davenport front desk to see this special room. The Concierge graciously took me up to the Circus Room and shared some GREAT stories about the room itself; Mr. Davenport; and other topics. What a magnificent space.

One afternoon I went on a walking tour of downtown Spokane which included both bits of historic information as well as bites of a variety of food and drink. It was both interesting and yummy.

In September or October I learned about the over 300-mile Great Allegheny Bike Trail, between Washington DC and Pittsburg. Imagine my surprise when there was a session offered, about THIS Bike Trail, discussing how to integrate the trail with the towns along the way to help economic development. Here in Estacada we are enthusiastically anticipating the new designation of the 70-mile Scenic Bike Way, from Estacada and Detroit. This class was a great layer of pertinent information as we move forward with this project.

On the last day I went on a 3.5-hour bus tour of the Spokane neighborhoods. It was both interesting and informative. We stopped along the way learning about the history of the First Nations; early Spokane; and the community today. We discussed interesting architecture and the various unique neighborhoods.

As a life-long learner, I found my trip to Spokane and this conference enlightening. I enjoyed meeting people from around the state, the region and the country. It was good to see that Spokane is in such great hands in the preservation realm.

For those responsible for helping to make this experience come to fruition, I THANK YOU.
